OVERVIEW

Whenever her faint-hearted husband leaves to sell door-to-door pesticides, a 1950s housewife juggles cooking, cleaning, and excessive sadism towards an indestructible cockroach squatting in her house.

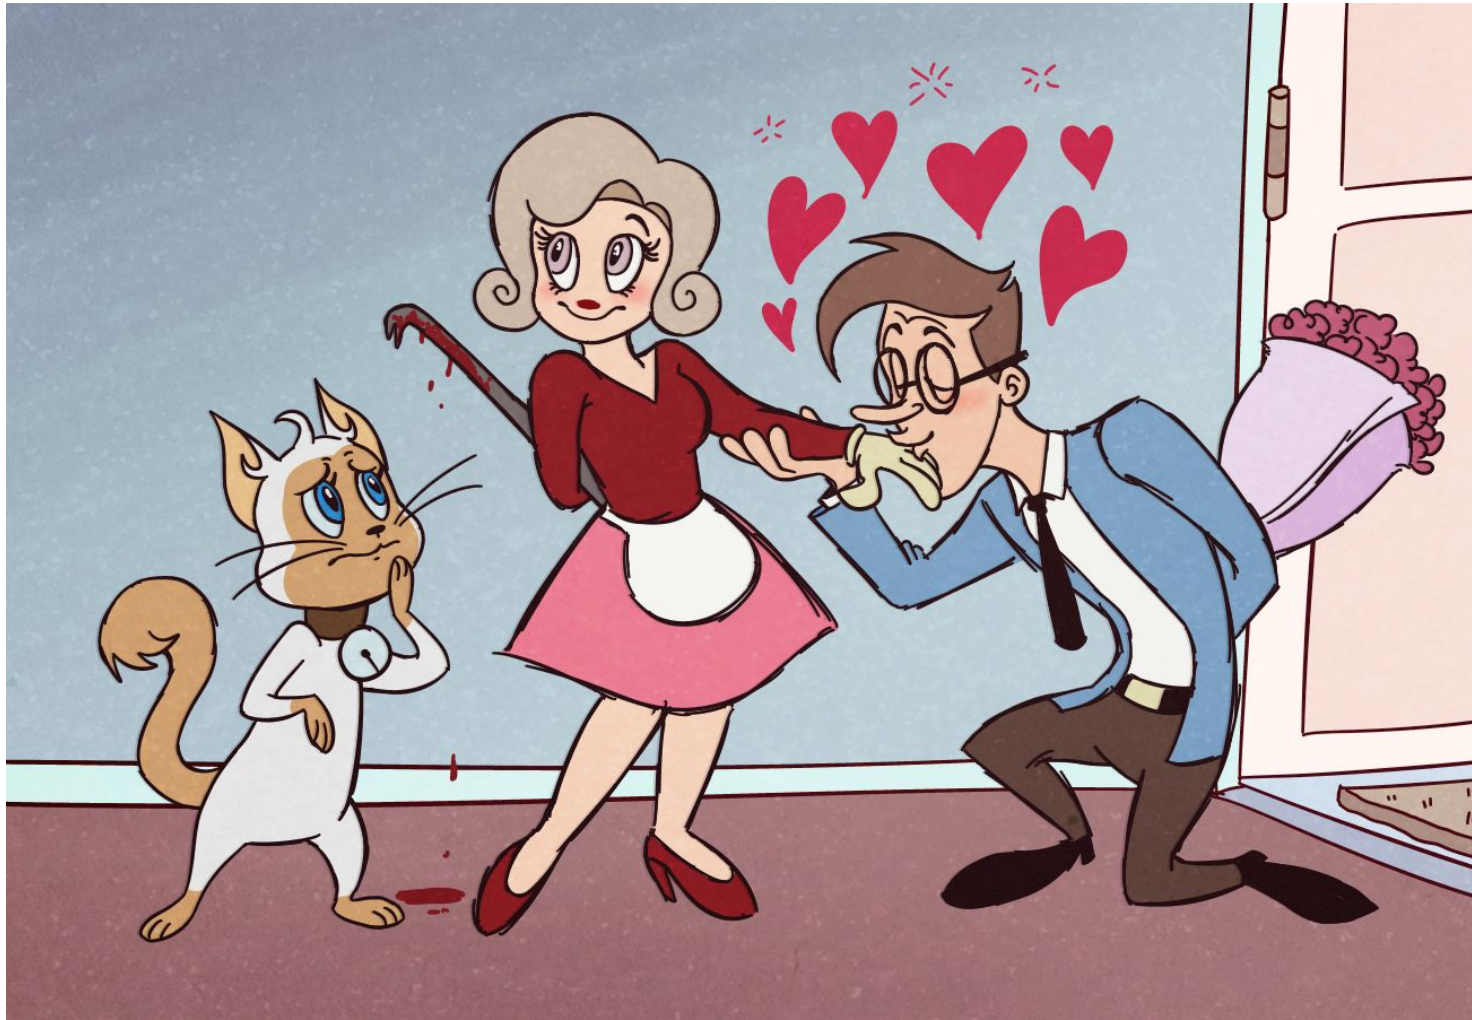

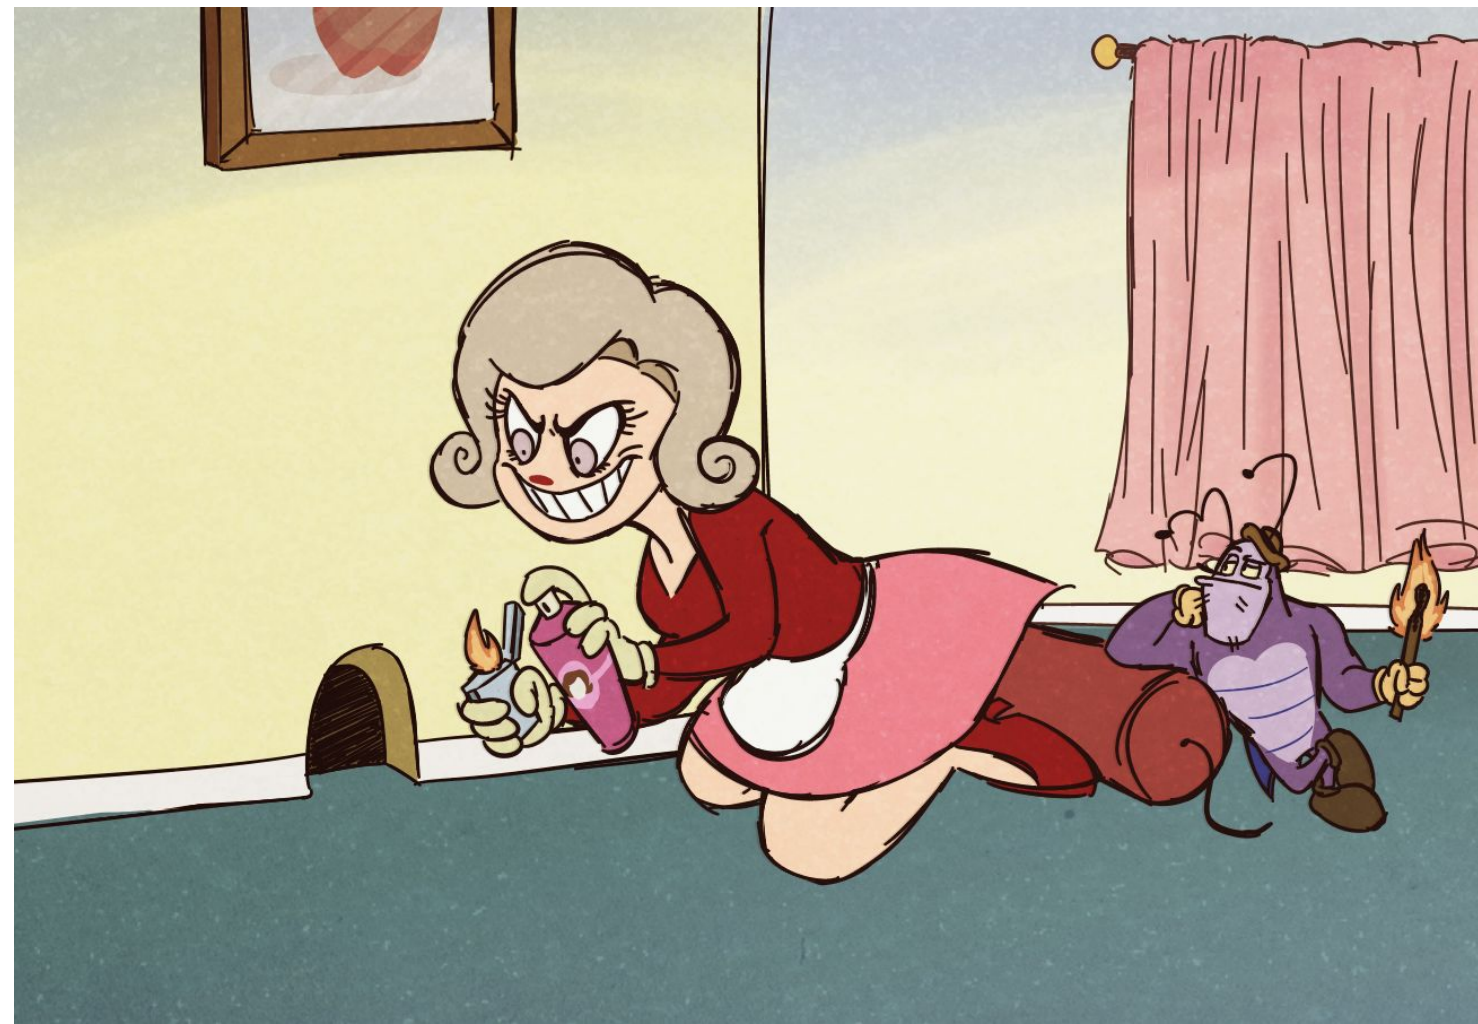

In a series of theatrical animated shorts, Honey Combe presents herself as the perfect housewife to the world. She cooks delicious and hearty meals, she tends to every inch of the house, and she provides her husband an emotional crutch to stand on. However, behind the pleasant and cheery facade, there festers an all-consuming hatred of pests, be they insects, rodents, or most despicable of all, cockroaches.

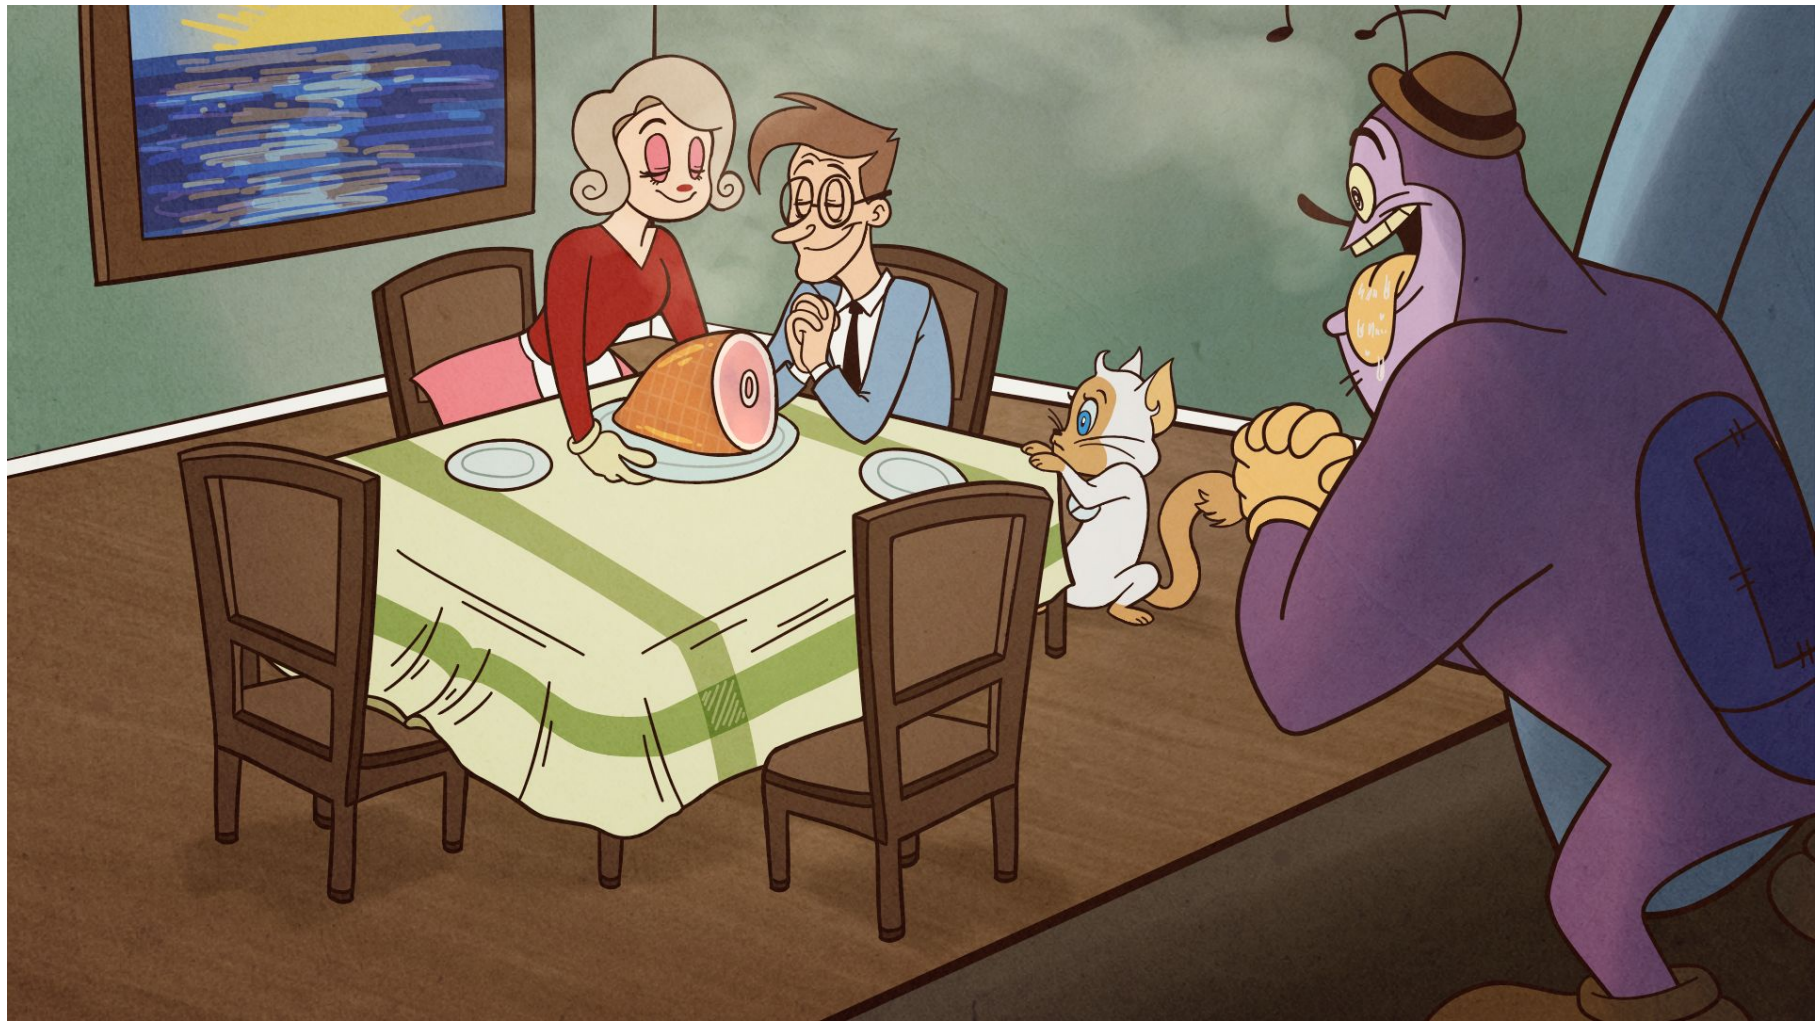

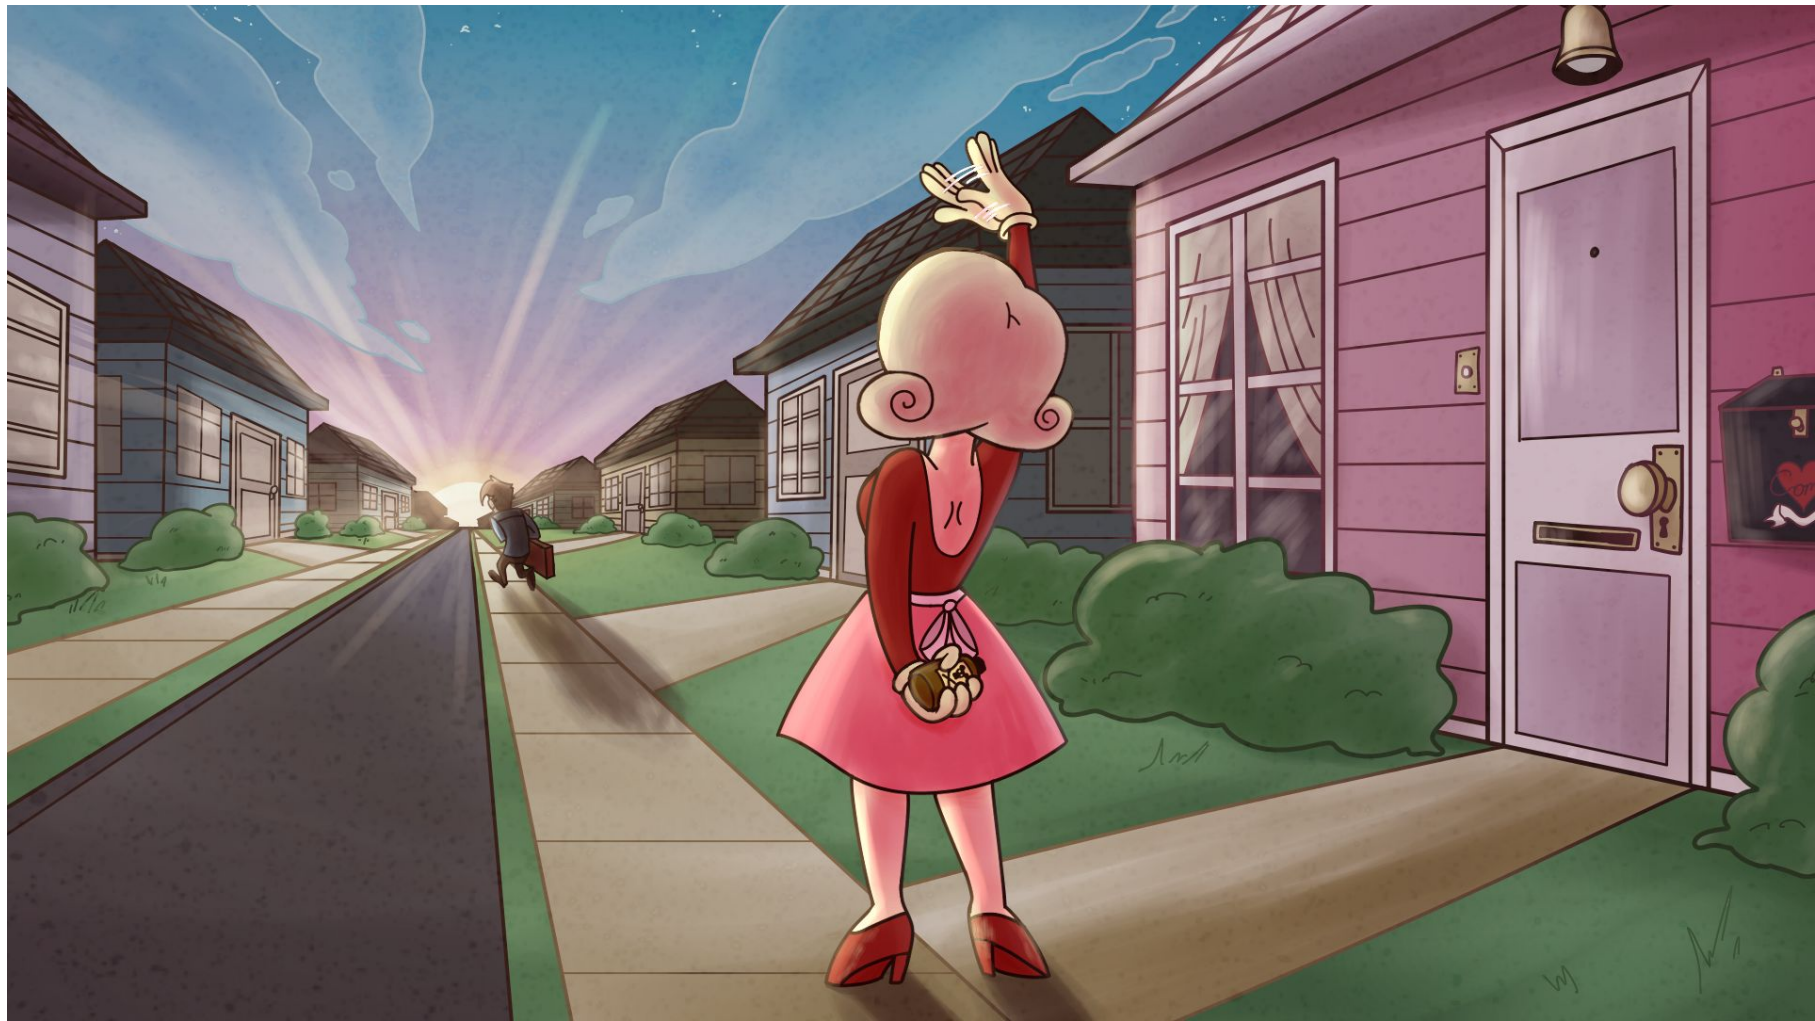

Although her timid husband, Harry Combe, bemoans the pesticide sales business he inherited, Honey gleefully uses the vast array of experimental pesticides to her advantage. The only witness to her violent streak is Dairy, Harry's beloved cat: equally as meek as the man of the house.

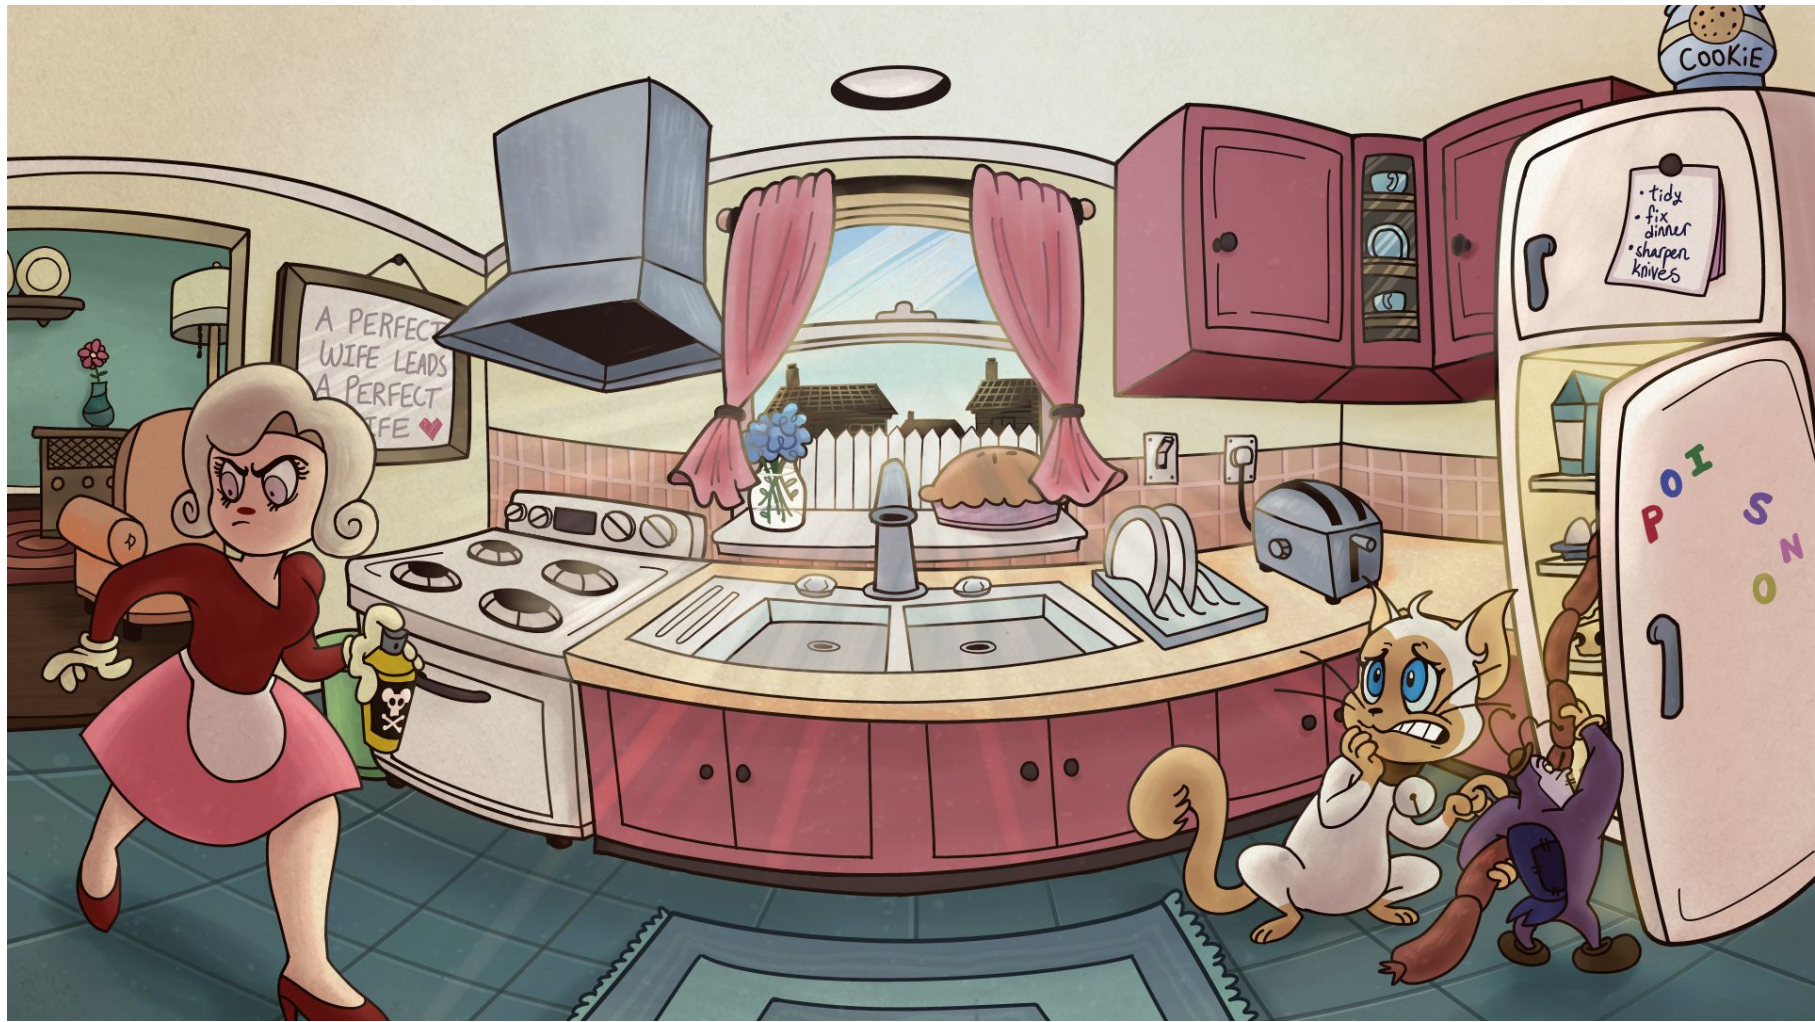

Between slaughtering pitiful pests and reaping the rewards of her husband's adoration, Honey essentially has the world under her thumb. That is until a resilient cockroach settles in her house out of the blue. Dubbed Smokes (for his love of cigars), this roach is a beefy, steadfast soul who lets no predator stop him from acquiring food and shelter. When Honey realizes that this new unwanted visitor refuses to croak like his brethren, it's a never-ending war of wits and weapons, all under Harry's nose.
